Fae

VORIN RACED THROUGH THE MEADOW, WINGS buzzing loudly as the forest creature grew quite. Something was wrong, he could sense it, an intruder in the sacred grove. His color shifted suddenly, now camouflaged with the surrounding foliage. Whoever was despoiling the land would feel the sting of the fae this day; of this, Vorin was sure.

Fae consider themselves to be nature's guardians. They call swamps, glades, and many other places in nature home. The fae tend to be reclusive, avoiding any unnecessary interaction with the "big folk" if it can be helped. Fae are very territorial and have no respect for those who would defile their land.

When anyone or anything encroaches on their land the fae are quick to respond, the first warning often pleasant and friendly, the second if not headed is followed by stinging pricks and burning poisons. One should respect fae land unless you wish to gather their ire.

A Budding Mind

Fae are a lithe and nimble race, reaching heights of 1 foot and weighing up to 5 pounds. They have varying degrees of chitinous plate covering their body, with their face and arms typically free of this plating. Their chitin and flesh like the wilderness they defend comes in an array of colors. Antenna often sprouts from their crown which comes in varied lengths.

Fae have no reproductive organs with which to identify what gender they are, the only evident factor being the breast like protrusions some females have which vary in size, making it difficult to use even that as an identifier. Additionally, their facial structure can be used in identifying them to a degree, this is not always accurate either as males can have delicate features.

Fae society does not have a viewpoint on sexuality, the concept is strange to them. They choose a mate based solely on how they feel about one another.

The Blossoming

Fae have a unique reproduction cycle. Once a year they undergo a ritual called the blossoming, during this time the fae go into hiding for a month. During this time, the fae who have coupled craft a cocoon and pour their essence into it. Eventually the chrysalis burst open as the blossoming nears its end, giving birth to a new fae.

During this time of year, the fae are very aggressive to anyone or anything coming into their territory and will often attack on sight. Most creatures will avoid fae territory knowing that any encroachment will be met with aggression. Some brave, or foolish poachers will try to use this to their advantage knowing the fae are not out in as large of numbers.

Caring and Compassion
Fae will be in friendly standing with local villages, aiding them at times, as long as the village respects the land and takes no more than they need. It is not uncommon for some fae to venture out into the world, to find new places in need of their help, and to enlighten people to the ways of the land, teaching them to respect it.

The First Chrysalis

As Hekodris wandered the new world mending the land he realized that no matter how much he repaired, destruction would find the land again in time. Hekodris spent many years pooling is arcana into a cocoon he plucked from a felled tree as he traveled the world. No longer did he have the ability to sculpt life on a whim, sealed away was that with his true power, but he believed that given enough time and using what nature provided him, their may yet be hope.

One day as Hekodris began to replant a grove the sound of something splitting stopped him. Moments later the familiar cocoon around his neck split wide and strange little creatures emerged. Hekodris cradled them in his hand and smiled, he was right, nature always finds a way. Hekodris taught them to care for the land and dubbed them fae, natures guardians.

A Sharp Stinger

The fae are ferocious fighters despite their stature. They tend to make their armaments from natural sources, but have been known to trade for metal weapons, or take sewing needles, pockets knives and other such things to repurpose into weapons. Fae will often wear leather armor, or light metal pieces if it suites them, as anything more is difficult to maneuver in.

The fae know how to make the most out of their small weapons, and will strike at vulnerable areas such as the eyes, the neck, and tendons. However what makes them truly deadly is their penchant for coating their weapons in all manner of poisons.

Fae are some of the best poison crafters in the world with their vast knowledge of nature and its toxins. Not all fae poison is deadly, the most common one being a sedative to put trespassers to sleep and relocate them. The truly vile poisons are used sparingly and only for true threats to their home.

Fae are also known to breed and train large wasps and bees to use as mounts and beasts of burden. Fae will sometimes sell their vespa to be used as guardians or mounts to other small races. Some of the "big folk" will barter for or capture the vespa, using them as fighting creatures in gambling dens. Fae would not willingly allow their vespa to be used in such a way and are quick to seek retribution on those that would do so.

Hekodris
A mysterious guardian of the wilderness, often taking the guise of a hermit who wonders the land replanting and tending to nature. Hekodris wishes to maintain the balance, making sure that nature is respected and taken care of for all that it provides. Once a godlike being, a vile creature used a powerful ritual to rip the majority of Hekodris`s power away for reasons unknown.

None can say what he would do if ever he got his full strength back. Perhaps he would seek revenge on the being that took it from him, maybe he would punish those who despoil the planet, or perhaps he would continue as he has for ages, wondering the world and enlightening those who would listen.

If such a figure does not fit into your game, feel free to insert a creator of your own for the fae. Perhaps a powerful druid created them or they could have crossed over from the feywild. Create an origin for them that works best for you.

Swat: When you are the target of a physical attack by a large or larger creature they take a -5 penalty to the attack roll but deal +10 damage on a successful hit.
Tiny: You may move through or occupy the space of tiny or larger creatures.

Vespa

Just as some would say a dog is mans best friend, a vespa is faes. These large breeds of wasp and bees are a big part of fae culture, serving is companions, guards, mounts, and workers. There are many breeds of vespa, but the Worker Bee and Killer Hornet are the most common.

Worker Bees are the backbone of the fae workforce. These bees are exceptionally strong, bred for work these bees can carry objects many times their size. They are still quite capable of defending themselves should the need arise.

Killer Hornets were bred for war and serve as guardians of fae territory and mounts to fae warriors. These large hornets posses the unique ability to fire their stingers like a projectile to deliver their potent poison from range and have slashing mandibles to tear at enemies.
